The group is learning about Tongan culture and how to make ngatu, a cloth made from bark. (Ngatu is known as tapa in many Pacific countries.) The group meets on Saturdays in a school hall in Taita, near Wellington. It’s a long way from the Kingdom of Tonga, which is about 2,000 kilometres north of New Zealand.

There are grandmothers, mothers, and daughters in the group. Megan and Lita are cousins. They love taking part in the ngatu workshops. They get to spend the day with their grandmother, Uoleva, their mothers, and other women and girls from the Tongan community in Wellington.
Growing up in Tonga

Uoleva and her sister Mele are the elders (the taukei) of the group. They sit at each end of the table and guide the women as they work.

Uoleva and Mele remember growing up in Tonga in the 1950s and 1960s. They lived in a village called Tatakamotonga. There were fifteen children in the family – seven girls and eight boys. The boys worked in the fields with their father and went fishing. The girls worked with their mother making ngatu.

A treasure in Tonga

Mele says that in Tonga, ngatu is a treasure. “When we’re born, we are wrapped in ngatu, and when we die, we are also wrapped in it. Today it’s used mainly for special occasions such as royal ceremonies, birthdays, weddings, and funerals.” The Tongan community in New Zealand also uses ngatu for special occasions.

Ngatu is made from the bark (tutu) of the paper mulberry tree (hiapo). Making ngatu is called koka'anga. Ngatu is very important in Tonga. It is used for blankets, mats, clothes – and even kites.

“Our mother started teaching us to make ngatu when we were five or six years old. Now we are passing on what we learnt to our daughters and granddaughters,” says Uoleva. “Megan and Lita were born in New Zealand, so it’s very important they learn our traditional Tongan ways.”
Koka‘anga – making ngatu

There are many steps to make the ngatu.

1. After the hiapo is cut down, women and girls peel the bark from the tree.

2. They hang the bark in the sun to dry.

3. They soak the dried bark in water to make it soft.

4. They beat the bark with a wooden tool called an ike to make it thinner and wider.

5. They dry the bark in the sun again.

These strips of dry, flat bark are called feta‘aki. The hiapo tree doesn’t grow well in New Zealand, so feta‘aki isn’t made here – it’s sent to the group from Tonga.

6. In the school hall, the women and girls cover the table with material. This will be backing for the ngatu.

7. They line up feta‘aki along the table on top of this backing material. Then they paste the edges of the feta‘aki to the backing material.

8. They cover the backing material with paste.

9. They carefully lay the feta‘aki over the top of the backing material. Then they press the two pieces together and slowly roll them up.

10. They carry the ngatu outside and roll it out on the concrete so it can dry in the sun. When it is dry, they will paint the ngatu with some brown dye, using a piece of feta‘aki as a brush.
Over four months, the group has made twenty large pieces of ngatu. Each woman takes a piece home. At home, they plan the design and then paint the ngatu. They might use designs of turtles, fish, birds, and animals. They might include the Tongan flag. Each piece of ngatu tells a story.

Once all the ngatu have been painted, they will be shown in an exhibition. Everyone from the community can come and admire the work.

For Lita, her favourite part is painting the ngatu with her mother and grandmother. “I like doing art and spending time with my nana and mum. I will be very proud and happy when my family sees the exhibition and what we have done.”

Megan is excited about taking photos of the ngatu. She will send them to her godmother in Tonga. When her godmother sees the photos, she will know that Megan is learning about Tongan culture and helping to keep alive the tradition of making ngatu.

“One day, I want to teach my daughters and granddaughters how to make ngatu – just like my nana has,” Megan says.
Tongan vocabulary

feta’aki: the dried pieces of the beaten bark hiapo: the paper mulberry tree (known as “aute” to Māori)

ike: a wooden tool for beating the ngatu

koka’anga: the way of making ngatu

lea faka-Tonga: the Tongan language

ngatu: the Tongan word for tapa

taukei: the older women who are experienced in making ngatu

tutu: the bark used to make ngatu
Ngatu: Keeping the Tradition Alive
by Iona McNaughton

The Ministry of Education and Lift Education would like to thank:
• the St John Avalon Tongan Congregation, Lower Hutt HCUC Parish Women’s Fellowship “Akomai Ngatu Project” for sharing their knowledge of Tongan culture and ngatu
• Pomare School, who provide support for the project
• Kaufo’ou Taulata for all her help with developing and checking the article.

Text copyright © Crown 2018

The images on the following pages are copyright © Crown 2018:
2–4, 5 (top), 6–7 (feta’aki strip at top), 7, 8 (top), 9, 10 (top and bottom), and 11 by Mark Coote
3–8 and 10–11 (ngatu background) by Liz Tui Morris
6 (process illustrations) by Scott Pearson

The images on the following pages are used with permission:
5 (bottom) copyright © Margaret Vickers
8 copyright © Kaufo’ou Taulata
10 (middle) copyright © Oldman Collection, Museum of New Zealand Te Papa Tongarewa

For copyright information about how you can use this material, go to:
http://www.tki.org.nz/Copyright-in-Schools/Terms-of-use

Published 2018 by the Ministry of Education, PO Box 1666, Wellington 6140, New Zealand.
www.education.govt.nz

All rights reserved.
Enquiries should be made to the publisher.

ISBN 978 1 77669 297 2 (online)

Published Services: Lift Education E Tū
Editor: David Chadwick
Designer: Liz Tui Morris
Literacy Consultant: Melanie Winthrop
Consulting Editors: Hōne Apanui, Ross Calman, and Emeli Sione

Curriculum learning area
English
Technology
Social Sciences
The Arts: Visual Arts

Reading year level
Year 4

Keywords
community, culture, design, family, feta’aki, grandparents, identity, lea faka-Tonga, ngatu, parents, processes, tapa, Tonga, traditions